Context:

Over the past years, the Central and West Africa regions have become major migratory hubs for mixed migration flows towards North Africa and Europe. Indeed, the difficult socio-economic situations as well as difficult climate conditions, internal conflicts and terrorism push many people to look for better living conditions and professional opportunities. Most migrants leaving these regions attempt to reach Algeria or Libya, principally in an irregular way rendering them vulnerable to abuse from traffickers and smugglers. IOM has observed that before departure or during the trip, many migrants are deceived regarding migration opportunities and become Victims of Trafficking (VoTs) in countries of transit or destination and are exposed to forced labour and sexual exploitation. Subsequently, the phenomenon of trafficking in human beings and smuggling of migrants is a lucrative business which relies on international networks operating throughout the region, including in Niger and Nigeria. Indeed, Nigeria represents a main country of origin for exploited, trafficked and smuggled migrants, while Niger is the main country of transit for migrants heading to Northern Africa where, through international networks, victims are trafficked and smuggled to Europe. These migratory routes can be seen in data collected by the International Organization for Migration (IOM), which estimates that about 96,657 Nigerien and Nigerian migrants left their respective countries for North Africa in 2018<sup>1</sup>. More specifically, in 2018, out of 72 VoTs assisted by IOM in Niger, 57 (i.e. 79%) were Nigerians.

Ongoing interventions by to address these crimes includes efforts aimed at improved border management systems as well as international cooperation between Nigeria and Niger. However, the scale of the phenomenon requires an understanding not only of the legal and technical elements but an acknowledgement of the impact of community engagement on the effective prevention and combatting of trafficking in human beings and smuggling. IOM's comprehensive and holistic approach to countering SoM and TiP includes engaging and collaborating with broader stakeholders specifically border and transit communities to address the factors that enable and support criminal activity across the border corridor, ensuring that interventions do not increase the risk and vulnerabilities of migrants, and the provision of comprehensive protection and reintegration service for victims of trafficking is required to stem TiP and strengthen community resilience to the scourge. At the core of the designed intervention approach, IOM seeks to build and enhance the resilience of these vulnerable communities and recognising that gender and cultural practices are central to this process.
